

The Internationalization of Foreign Investment in Europe

by John H. Dunning & Michael P. Kenwood

Journal of International Business Studies, Volume 23, Number 3, September 1992

1. Abstract: This paper examines the effects of internationalization on the foreign investment position of European countries. It is argued that the process of internationalization has led to a significant increase in the foreign investment position of European countries, and that this process is likely to continue in the future. The paper also discusses the implications of internationalization for the development of European countries.
2. Introduction: The process of internationalization has led to a significant increase in the foreign investment position of European countries. This process is likely to continue in the future, and will have important implications for the development of European countries.
3. The Internationalization of Foreign Investment: The process of internationalization has led to a significant increase in the foreign investment position of European countries. This process is likely to continue in the future, and will have important implications for the development of European countries.
4. Conclusion: The process of internationalization has led to a significant increase in the foreign investment position of European countries. This process is likely to continue in the future, and will have important implications for the development of European countries.
